POWERING OUR REMOTE TOWER SITES

Some of our wireless tower sites are located quite remotely, well beyond the reach of existing power lines. Contracting new lines can be very expensive and time consuming, so we've gone about powering our radio equipment in other ways.

One thing we have in plentiful supply around here is sunshine. In the photo below of one of our Springville towers, you can see to the left an array of solar panels. These panels convert sunshine to electricity, which is stored in a bank of large batteries to provide continuous power day and night and during stormy weather.

Not visible in this photo is the wind turbine we installed later, as an additional source of power to supplement the solar panels. The system is independent, reliable, and all-natural.
